A photo series about Death, surprisingly, because these pictures might strike you as strangely hopeful. They were shot at the cemeteries of Mannheim, Germany, with a Fujifilm X-T20 and a Jupiter-11 135mm lens from the 1950s Soviet Union.

This document is the work
— not a summary of it.

What you hold is the proof
— not what is in it.

“The medium is the message,” said
Marshall McLuhan. Let design therefore be about what you hold, not about what I sell.

I. Moonlight Jack

— what an artist means

In 2019, Moonlight Jack approached me with a dream. “The music industry is tough,” he said, “but I’m gonna do it anyway.”

He came with a plan, a budget, a producer, a sound engineer, but he needed a visual language, one that didn’t exist yet. Warren G was his northstar — but what emerged, over five years and two albums, was something else entirely.

The music was already unusual — 1990s R&B songwriting over Synthwave production. No one in the team knew what to call it. That was the point.

The first attempt went too phantastical, the second one too raw. The third found Moonlight Jack’s voice: retro-futurism inspired by the movies he liked, lights reflecting into the camera lens, a human soul lost in the shadows of a night on the streets. The song was about a woman blinded by city lights, about going out and wanting more. City Lights became his most successful song by all measures. Moonlight Jack’s career started off with a gunshot. This was his voice.

After the success of City Lights, Moonlight Jack's next project would be Prologue. It had range — Synthwave at its most epic alongside calmer and more melancholic sounds.

The covers followed — darker, more interior, more obscure. The ambition was at its highest point. So was the uncertainty about where this was going.

Above: single cover for "Down to Rest", inspired by the visual style of the 'Need for Need' series. Below: single cover for "Hold It Down". Right: album cover for "Inferno", inspired by 1980s Horror movies.

For the next project, Underworld, the sound went quiet — minimal production, close vocals. Something was being stripped away. Underworld culminated in Moonlight Jack's first studio album — not the album we expected, but an album true to his vision.

Moonlight Jack's second and final studio album was Inferno. It didn't sound like R&B anymore. The music had become liquid. After four years, he wasn't announcing an end — he was making one deliberately, on his own terms. He started as a Warren G copycat. He ended as Moonlight Jack. This was the career of someone who knew the music industry was tough, and who did it anyway, a career that finally went out in a blaze of glory in 2023 — he ended it in an Inferno.

II. Sans Saint

— a medium with a message

Founded in Trier in 2025, Sans Saint is a graphic design agency grounded in symbolic depth, European tradition, and ethical workflows. Founded to create design that is not just beautiful — but meaningful.

The figuremark of Sans Saint is an abstraction of the Liebfrauenkirche in Trier, constructed from a Vesica piscis to create a pointed Gothic arch that signifies spirituality and dignity.

At its centre stands the star-cross, a symbol of paradox, simultaneously of death and life, beginning and end.

“Form follows function,” said Louis Sullivan. Sans Saint says that purpose precedes both form and function, that true design needs to exist, not because it works or because it is beautiful — but because the world would be worse off without it.

The wordmark of Sans Saint is based on the Romain du Roi typeface, originally commissioned by Louis XIV in 1692, it was modified and modernized to meet the standards of a 21st-century logo.

Artisanat en adoration de la Déité. de la Déité.

The brand font of Sans Saint is EB Garamond, an open-source project overseen by Georg Duffner and Octavio Pardo, based on a 1592 specimen created by the Egenolff-Berner print workshop in Frankfurt.

The name states who this is: a graphic design agency without a saint. The slogan states what this is: Artisanship in adoration of the Deity. The paradox of Sans Saint’s existence is fully contained in its logo.

Design is not just what something looks like. It how something works, how it scales, how it survives contact with the real world.

The button shape is a Vesica piscis, encoded directly in CSS.

Sans Saint is not a typesetting agency — it is a system: a website with an open-source codebase, a Python pipeline that processes hundreds of photographs into Instagram-ready JPEG files within seconds. This is not a concession to technology. It is the conviction that tradition without capability is nostalgia. The tools change — the standard doesn't.

Every format, one question: Where in the geometry of nature is Eden? The answer changes — the question doesn't. The medium is never the same — but the message is. Sans Saint exists to give answer, to send a message that is designed to be listened to — today, tomorrow.

III. Posters

— a world of messages

Wer denkt,

bewegt sich.

We live in a world of messages. Every wall, every screen, every passing stranger with a tote bag is trying to sell you something. But a true message is not supposed to be loud. It is supposed to just make you think, move.
